

NDIS Worker Screening

Residential Aged Care Requirements

Residential Aged Care Requirements

What changes are there to screening requirements?

RAC providers delivering NDIS supports or services are now registered NDIS providers. This means that RAC providers must comply with NDIS screening requirements.

The NDIS worker screening rules that apply to RAC registered providers are available at National Disability Insurance Scheme \(Practice Standards – Worker Screening\) Rules 2018. Existing employment screening checks continue to be recognized until they expire, are revoked or cancelled.

RAC providers must make sure all workers in risk assessed roles have an NDIS worker screening check unless they have another acceptable check. Records must also be kept about engagement and screening of workers in these roles.

Further information about the changes for RAC registered providers can also be found at the NDIS Commission website.

Who needs a worker screening check?

Any worker employed by a RAC registered provider delivering NDIS supports and services in a risk assessed role needs a clearance before they can start work. Risk assessed roles include key personnel or managers, those directly delivering NDIS supports or services and those with more than incidental contact with people with disability. RAC providers can find more information about risk assessed roles and the associated worker screening requirements at the NDIS Commission website.

What about existing workers who have a valid police check?

Workers who already had a police certificate issued under the Accountability Principles 2014 can continue working in risk assessed roles until the police certificate expires or is cancelled. These workers will be required to obtain an NDIS worker screening clearance prior to the certificate expiring or being cancelled to continue delivering disability supports and services in that role.

What checks do new RAC workers require?

All new workers need an NDIS worker screening clearance before they can start work.
